The fashion industry is at the mercy of the next mass movement, and it may well come out of the world of online voting. For more on that, read on... For much of the last decade, democracy has been in the back seat in the fashion industry. We're meant to listen to the opinion of a bunch of strangers and buy our clothes accordingly, in an industry where the 'consumer' is even more powerless than you might expect. The environment has always been hostile to a return to democracy, however. In the 1960s, the then-powerful British trade unions threatened to stop selling certain clothes to retailers who didn't play ball. Fast forward 50 years and the fashion industry is still organised around a model which puts all our power in the hands of a small elite of fashion insiders. From short-term style to long-term lifestyle, the choices are made by people who won't go near your wardrobe, but we're expected to put up with the limitations of what they suggest. Things are beginning to change. With the rise of e-commerce, we've seen the start of a democratisation in the industry. Most notably, the customer has begun to reclaim their power. But what if their influence had been expanded even further? I've been thinking about how that could happen, and the only answer I could find was 82157476af
